Why should college sports matter? Some say that the postseason always ends up being the best part of the year. For basketball fans, it's the postseason and everything leading up to it. As we get closer to the upcoming national championship, this could be your last chance to see your favorite team play. It's a question that doesn't easily answer itself. How exactly does a postseason chase for a title cause anything to matter? We all know that the college basketball season is mostly meaningless, so I'm not trying to be negative, but even a championship wouldn't be enough to endear the sport to the casual basketball fan. What's crazy about the NCAA Tournament is that the teams in the field are essentially unknown. There are three teams that are currently ranked in the Associated Press' Top 25: Baylor, Kansas and Ohio State. The rest of the field is filled with basketball-less schools. The teams in the tournament include the second-most NCAA tournament appearances ever, the second-most NCAA tournament wins in a row, and the current longest win streak in the tournament. They also feature two of the best coaches in the world, which is why people tend to associate these teams with basketball anyway. Nobody can honestly tell you what's going to happen in this tournament. Baylor is clearly the most talented team in the field and has won 32 regular season games, but only two of those were against ranked opponents. Ohio State has also won a lot of games and is led by a strong head coach, but the rest of their roster just doesn't stack up in comparison. For that reason, this tournament could be anyone's game. But that's a good thing. We all know college basketball is a bunch of mediocre, pretentious, overpaid, unathletic players. We also know that the postseason is when basketball truly shines. The fast-paced games and unbelievable three-point shots entertain us, and it's all because there is no specific reason to care who wins anymore. In March, we don't care who wins. We just want to see what we will see in April, May and June.
