A study among beer drinking Americans in a single location highlighted a notable relationship. Alcoholics in teh group were significantly more likely to drink alone, and those who drank alone reported higher levels of stress, and more alcohol use during the previous month. The number of studies supporting the impact of loneliness on health have quadrupled in the last few years. There is a growing awareness of the need for loneliness and social isolation prevention. Central to the promotion of wellbeing is the ability to contribute. This applies to both the health sector and the wider community. Volunteering is a traditional way of providing care, training for future generations and providing a sense of connection to others. Loneliness is related to low self-esteem, increased stress and lower mood. According to the 2014 survey, 15.6% of the population experience high levels of loneliness. Even for those who are married or live with a partner, 61% report feeling alone from time to time. This week (25th-30th November) is World Health Day, a global day of action where each year we promote health and wellbeing in communities around the world. Last week, the Minister for Health, Dr Jonathan Coleman, launched a report into depression for people in Ireland. I have observed that every time the topic comes up in the media, headlines are about the problems which can come from this illness. These include suicide, self harm and even taking one's life. In 2014, the journal the Lancet published what we now know to be the definitive picture of levels of depression across the UK.1 Being depressed doesn't mean that you will simply get better without help. At its most severe, depression can be the cause of suicide. In 2013, 3,400 people died by suicide in Ireland. Last week the Irish Medical
